That's him there,
late in our fragment, laughing with three friends, as he points out to our point of view some sight he never share.

He smokes a long
sobranie it must be, brangs away at a girl who tires of him by the look and turns to us, licks out her tongue

and wanders up, fanning a smirk. Now even the camera fumbles as she approaches, she's almost filling the frame - one wet black lip

loves all. After this Epaphus, his friend,
now drunk, shakes him and leers. Was this the time he told him his father wasn't his father really and Phaetom, stunned,

backed into space?
No, this time he grins, Phaeton, lifts
a fluted glass off a tray, downs it and grins and sets his eyes

coolly on us,
on the lens, on the future - that hungry severity of anything lost forever is shrinking us all to eager toddlers

blinking back into the flicker. He finished up another.
His mouth is forming words while we hear nothing but flutter and tick

then our lens
fixes on him, doesn't mean to be caught up but jam and is. A blot spreads out of the center and all it burns.
